

HELP WORKERS AT McDONALD'S GET A FAIR DEAL AT WORK

Last year, workers at McDonald's took strike action for the first time in history.

People working at McDonald's endure low pay, zero-hours contracts and problems with bullying and harassment by poorly trained and low-paid managers.

McDonald's employs over 115,000 workers in around 12,000 restaurants, with a turnover of £17bn a year. Its chief executive picks up nearly £12m a year, while those on the shop floor earn just above the legal minimum. Workers often don't even know how many hours they'll be working from week-to-week.

These problems persist because the company won't allow McDonald's workers a trade union voice at work. Trade unions represent people at work, raising concerns and working with employers to tackle problems like the ones that are common at McDonald's.

© Joe Randle/Getty Images

We are calling on McDonald's to recognise the Bakers Food and Allied Workers Union so that all workers can enjoy a fair deal at work and we need your help.

Show your support by signing the petition at tuc.org.uk/mcdonalds

heartunions.org
#heartunions

 UNIONS